Peyton Manning and his family arrive at Broncos headquarters for the first day of his employment with the team. AP Photo/Jack Dempsey Denver Broncos quarterback Peyton Manning. Brad Penner, USA TODAY Sports Denver Broncos quarterback Peyton Manning delivers a pregame speech before the Denver Broncos host the New England Patriots at Sports Authority Field at Mile High in Denver. Manning is scheduled to make his first public appearance as a Denver Bronco at a press conference at 4:30 p.m. ET on Wednesday. Manning, who signed a five-year contract with the Broncos on Wednesday, has been on vacation at his home in Hawaii since the Super Bowl, where the Denver Broncos lost to the Seattle Seahawks. On the eve of his new team's season, he attended practice Monday in Denver for the first time since the Broncos announced his signing on Feb. 10. Manning, 37, was a two-time Super Bowl champion with the Indianapolis Colts. He announced his retirement on Sept. 20, after the Colts won their third consecutive AFC South crown and the AFC championship. "It was a choice, and I had to make a decision," Manning said in a statement released by the Colts. "I believe this is the best decision for my family, my teammates, the Indianapolis Colts and the Colts fans. "I wish the Indianapolis Colts and the Colts fans nothing but success as they move forward." Manning is scheduled to make his first public appearance as a Denver Bronco at a press conference at 4:30 p.m. ET on Wednesday.

Q: How to see my app's queries when using ".gradlew app:launch" I'd like to see my app's queries. Basically, I'm looking for a "sunspot-solr" or a "solr-cloud" or a "solr-client" solution. How can I do it from the command line? A: I'm not aware of any such thing, but you could write a Gradle task that logs the query to see what you're doing. That task could be run after the build, so you can see what queries are being executed on the app server. Here's a possible way to do it: `task logQuery(type: org.gradle.api.tasks.Internal) { doLast { String query = app.get`

This invention relates to an instrument employing a mineral trioxide aggregate as a dental restorative material. The invention also relates to the use of MTA as a root repair material as well as to the use of mineral trioxide aggregate as a root repair material. Mineral trioxide aggregate (MTA) is gaining popularity as a restorative material for tooth hard tissue repair and as a root repair material. A variety of compositions have been formulated for these uses. Although the compositions vary, all of the compositions share common characteristics. The compositions have a high pH and contain a variety of other components. Some common ingredients include water, monomeric acids, water soluble polymer, such as polyvinyl-alcohol, radiopacifier, inert filler, and set accelerator. A material referred to as MTA-Angelus consists essentially, by weight, of 48.5% silica, 41.4% calcium sulfate, 5.1% calcium chloride, 1.4% aluminum sulfate, 0.5% polyvinyl alcohol and 1.4% bismuth oxide. A material referred to as MTA-Bio is a sterile, sterile powder that consists essentially, by weight, of calcium sulfate dihydrate, silica, calcium carbonate, aluminum oxide, magnesium oxide, zirconium oxide, sodium oxide, and tricalcium phosphate. A material referred to as ProRoot MTA is a sterile, sterile powder consisting essentially, by weight, of calcium sulfate dihydrate, silica, calcium carbonate, calcium chloride, zirconium oxide, gypsum dihydrate, aluminum oxide, magnesium oxide, and iron oxide. The use of MTA in root repair is most commonly performed to repair lateral root fractures and perforations. In addition, the technique of placing the dental restorative material in the root canal is commonly referred to as the apexification method. The steps involved in the apexification process are well known to those of ordinary skill in the art and include the following: removing the fractured or necrotic root tissue; shaping the root canal with a hand, rotary or ultrasonic instrument; cleaning the root canal with either a paper cone or the use of a carrier liquid; placing the MTA material in the root canal; allowing the MTA to set; and removing the excess MTA material. The techniques are described, for example, by Cartwright et al. (1995). Dosing parameters of estramustine phosphate in combination with vinorelbine. To establish a
