As part of a comprehensive therapeutic program, which is administered on the basis of a Social Partnership contract, the workers of a psychiatric services department in the north of Germany organized a total of 1,436 follow-up visits and made notes on 1,124 of them. Differences in the proportion of house calls and/or telephone contacts by psychiatric workers versus visits by mental handicap physicians and family doctors were analyzed for various illnesses, therapeutic strategies, and personnel; the housing situation, social and economic conditions, and the way of life of the patients were also taken into consideration. The proportion of mental handicap doctors visiting the home was highest for schizophrenic patients. Family doctors were visited more by alcoholic than by schizophrenic patients. The method and timing of a home visit seemed to be important in the therapeutic work. These observations suggest that guidelines for evaluating and implementing a programme for home visits are urgently needed.Mountain biking--a sustainable mode of transportation in rural populations.
