The IP and hostname for the service is stored in a configuration file that is updated regularly and I'd like the program to check if the domain actually exists before attempting to resolve the hostname. Is there a way to check if the domain name exists before calling gethostbyname()? A: The best way is not to call gethostbyname(). You should get yourself a DNS server which supports SRV record that lists the name of the service you are looking for. The Nintendo Switch is all set for its launch and to show everyone what it can do, Nintendo has revealed the first batch of titles that will be available from the very start. Since the company has been keeping very tight lipped about the Switch hardware, it has been a bit tricky to figure out which games are actually in the Switch package. Nintendo announced this week that every game that will be available from the day of launch will be featured on the eShop.
