"I believe in public education," Dad says. "But it's not public policy or public relations. You can't make me believe that. I believe in public education. When I got out of law school at night, I'd go home, and I'd read the kids." He laughs. "I'd read a page or two before I'd go to sleep. But my kids are in grade school, all of them. They need a place where they can go somewhere where the academic environment is better than it is at home." He says that there is a lot of evidence that shows that the best performers in high school go to college. "That's not what high school is about. It's not about playing on a football team or getting into a sorority or being part of something bigger than you. When I graduated from high school, I was the highest-rated football player that that school had ever had. I don't know why. I don't know why that came to pass. But it did, and I got good grades. " I ask him if he believes kids should take as many AP classes as possible. "I want my son to do what he wants to do," he says. "But the AP classes have a very negative effect on your credit-score, it's like getting a bill you can't pay. So I would caution them. My younger son, the one in the Army, he doesn't believe he should have to pay those." My favorite part of this interview is when Dad turns and looks at me. "I want you to go to a good college," he says. And this is true. But I can't help but wonder if Dad was just smearing his favorite son. "You didn't have a good college experience?" he asks. His father doesn't have anything good to say about my college experience. "The place had a lot of problems. But my son has been through all kinds of schools, just like he's been through all kinds of grades.
