In the following sections, we explain the features and tools of Photoshop. We also include some tips on using Photoshop to enhance photographs. Toning down exposures Gaining a suitable exposure is one of the most important steps in producing quality digital images. Exposure encompasses shutter speed, aperture, and camera ISO (light sensitivity). A good exposure is one where the camera doesn't overexpose the subject. The overexposure of the subject by the camera may result in an unrecognizable image. Therefore, it's important that you use an exposure setting that's appropriate for the lighting conditions. The basic exposure settings are as follows: Shutter speed: Longer shutter speeds provide the blurring effect of a slow-moving subject. The lower the shutter speed, the less blurring and the more recognizable the subject. With a shutter speed longer than 1/100 second, motion blur is evident. Aperture: As the aperture size gets smaller, light from the background intrudes into the picture, resulting in blurring. The lower the aperture setting, the less intrusion and blurring. For the same reason, a large aperture setting captures more of the picture's details. ISO: A high ISO setting (light sensitivity) captures bright details in shadows and darkness. A low ISO setting (light sensitivity) captures bright details in the highlights. Figure 14-3 shows the difference between high ISO and low ISO settings. **Figure 14-3:** A low ISO setting creates a brighter image. Many cameras offer a few exposure modes, including the following: Auto: When the camera senses low light, the exposure setting is automatically set to a fast or slow shutter speed or to a large or small aperture. This setting enables you to take a photo without thinking about it. The camera has enough experience to let you know the right shutter speed and aperture for the ambient lighting conditions. Sometimes, an auto option is insufficient, and you may need to adjust the exposure settings manually. P, Tv, Av, and M modes: These modes enable you to manually adjust the exposure settings. Adjustment methods include: Automatic: Sets the camera to the auto (exposure) mode, but you can then fine-tune the exposure settings. Exposure compensation: Adjusts the light exposure of the image in 1/3- or 1/2-stop increments up to + or - 3 stops. With this control, you can make
