I guess it's a new feature; but it's not obvious to me. A: I think they were designed to show the most recent commit. Edit: Committing an edit can now be done directly from the "Edit" page (as well as from the "edit summary" page) as of May 24, 2014. See From the moment a hurricane roars up the East Coast, the locals generally fall into three categories. The first is those who hunker down, seek shelter and pray for the best. Then there are those who remain in the wrecked towns, barely surviving on their pets, hoping someone will rescue them or their pets. And then there are the people who stay on in the hurricane zone, finding ways to help the local population, generally women and children, but not all. The third category is the people who remain in a dangerous area, taking extraordinary steps to continue to help the local population, generally women and children, but not always. As the storm evolves, life becomes difficult for these people. As the hurricane passes, conditions become more intense and difficult to be in. As the storm is moving away, conditions become safer and most are moved away, although not before being paid. While I don't pretend to know the inner thoughts of these people, it can only be explained by the circumstances they face and their beliefs. Often, I have seen people who truly live by their beliefs, without expecting anything in return, or being asked. I have seen people who refuse to accept money from anyone, despite immense financial need. And I have seen the other hand. At some point, I was with a group that paid a man to lead us to where we needed to go for supplies. He was paid more than others, and he stayed behind to guard the money
