Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to barrier devices for ensuring access of a person to an area, and in particular to a door or door system with a lockable lock having a key accessible by persons other than the person in possession of the key to open the lock. The invention relates more particularly to such a system, however, which includes features for preventing the access of others to the key when it is out of the person's possession, or the area protected by the lock. 2. Prior Art U.S. Pat. No. 4,180,284 describes and illustrates a key actuated lock that is arranged to be opened by the key through the use of a wafer with a key cut through it, the top surface of the wafer being depressed by the key for movement, opening the lock. The key is not normally visible to an observer, and the wafer must be manually held in place to prevent the key from being withdrawn by another person who is able to observe the wafer and depress the top surface of the wafer to gain access to the key and open the lock.
