GPS works by first determining the location of a receiver (e.g. a navigation receiver) and then using this location as a starting point to locate the rest of the navigation receiver. GPS works by having a number of global positioning satellites flying around the earth, and relaying a satellite navigation signal to a navigation receiver on a ground location. The ground location utilizes the satellite navigation signal to derive its position, and this position is then relayed to other devices or users. This technique may also be known as "pseudolites" since the navigation signal is not actually coming from the satellite, but rather generated by another device on the satellite. A commercial navigation receiver may provide a set of features for determining the user's position. For example, the navigation receiver may determine the user's position and speed, and optionally a user's heading, using a signal from a GNSS satellite. A navigation receiver may also utilize one or more Radio Frequency (RF) radios and/or a cellular or Wi-Fi communication antenna (hereafter "multiple antenna solution") to determine its position, speed, and heading. The GPS navigation receiver typically provides only position and speed information to the navigation user, but may add further information, such as a user's heading direction, thereby making the user's position determination more precise. An example of an RF radio used in conjunction with a navigation receiver is a Differential GPS receiver (DGPS), which uses the GPS navigation signal combined with a correction signal that provides the difference between the GPS navigation signal and an accurate position determination. Other examples of multiple antenna solutions may include a cellular base station, a Wi-Fi router, a Wi-Fi access point, a Zigbee wireless node, a Bluetooth enabled device, and/or the like, which provide separate RF signals. In GPS navigation receivers, when a new satellite becomes available to determine a user's position, the GPS navigation receiver
